Photographer and founder of Print Swap.

Sam Faulkner is a British photographer and the founder of Print Swap. He began in documentary photography after travelling to Afghanistan in the 1990s, work that won him the Ian Parry Award. Over the following decades his projects have explored conflict, memory and the human cost of political violence, including his work on the war on drugs.

Unseen Waterloo, his portrait project imagining the faces of Waterloo, examined how history remembers the ordinary soldiers of a battle fought before photography could record them — there is no photograph of an ordinary soldier from that war.

Across this work runs a sustained interest in what photographs preserve, and how they are valued. Print Swap traces back to a conversation with Magnum's David Hurn at the World Press Masterclass in 2001, about a lifetime of swapping prints with other photographers. The idea sat for twenty-five years until it resurfaced, looking at a gap on Sam's own wall.
